

The storyteller presented an allegory about those who preach much longer than their audience can bear¹.

There was once a cook that offered good soup for any takers. People from the neighborhood would come to his door with a cup, and he would pour soup into their cup. He didn't stop, however, when the cup was full, but kept pouring as the soup overflowed onto the floor.

When the recipients raised the alarm about the spilled soup, the cook said, "Well, the soup is so good that the cup should expand to receive more. If it was a really good cup, then it would never get filled up²!"

The issue wasn't that the soup didn't taste good – but the cup could only practically hold a certain amount. Each person's cup was a different size, but it was indeed finite, and would only hold so much.

It was sad that the cook could not see that young kids and older adults³ who came were in danger of slipping in the mess and hurting themselves. The neighbors suggested that they could easily come back another time for a refill, but the cook insisted on continuing to make a sticky mess even though it seemed so inefficient and wasteful.

The situation was such that people simply did not desire to return, and they sought their soup elsewhere.

The storyteller gave the conclusion that even Jesus, who was in truth "the Word⁴", kept His words simple and his parables short and to the point.

1. Consider Matthew 6:7; "And when you pray, do not keep on babbling like pagans, for they think they will be heard because of their many words."
2. As in, "If you were truly spiritual, you wouldn't worry about the time!"
3. This is a parallel to the difficulty of these two age groups to pay attention for very long
4. John 1:1, 14
